According to data from many neuroimaging studies, the neural circuit that seems to be most involved in OCD is the cortico-striatum-thalamus-cortical circuit CSTC. Although the precise mechanism of action of DBS is unknown, several studies have found that stimulation decreases the hyperactivity of the CSTC circuit, leading to a parallel decrease of symptoms. With the passing of time, the stimulation became more posterior according to the observation of greater benefits. The reason for this is probably the greater compactness of the bundles interconnecting the cortex and thalamus via the inferior thalamic pedunculus.
